

Japanese Baseball Perspective of American baseball

1. The Japanese think that the American's crying when they lose is a form of showing too much emotion. Since the Japanese are not very emotional people. So to them it is a symbol or sign of weakness. You just working on always improving yourself it is not about crying when they lose it is about improving.
2. The Japanese believe that American baseball players are traders because they can basically switch teams whenever they want. Where as in Japan they don't do that they stay loyal to the team they start with and don't switch up teams because it is considered very disrespectful. This goes with Samurai form of respect is you are loyal only to one team and one area.
3. They think that American baseball teams are weak because they don't train very hard at all. The Japanese train all year long and have about the same amount of games in a season even though they have 12 teams compared to the 30 American Teams. American teams don't don't train all year long so the Japanese think they are not full dedicated to what is their full time jobs.

American Baseball Perspective of Japanese baseball

1. The American baseball believe that Japanese baseball is weird for not being willing to change teams for better pay and other things like housing and being closer to family. They think it is weird to not change teams or be trade that you stay with that team all of your career until they want to let you go.

2. American believe Japanese it is unusual and weird that High School baseball is more popular than professional baseball. National high school baseball is aired Nationwide on tv and across all prefectures.
3. Americans think Japanese baseball because they are not emotionally attached to the game is what the American players think.

I believe Americans views of Japanese baseball is cultural because their baseball is so unknown to Americans. We don't take the time to understand Japanese cultural or another cultural. If they took the time to understand cultural then they would understand why the Japanese players have so much respect and love for the game and their teams. Where as the Japanese players it is also cultural for them and why they believe the perspective they have formed of American baseball players. They don't understand why Americans don't show very much respect to their coaches and teammates along with being so dedicated to the sport of baseball. They don't spend hours training and to Japanese that is weird because they do that consistently and live by the motto of trying your best and working your hardest at whatever you choose to do with your life. This is definitely a very cultural problem that both cultures don't understand the other cultural completely so it is a battle. They need to take time to each other and that would somewhat help change the perspectives of what they believe about the other groups culture.
